Symbiotic Creatures

Many species of animals live together in a way that benefits both. This is called a symbiotic relationship. Some animals live together in a way that is harmful to one of them. This is called a parasitic relationship. Some animals live together in a way that is neutral to both. This is called a commensal relationship.

Mutualism: Both animals benefit from the relationship. For example, a bee pollinates a flower, and the flower provides the bee with nectar.

Commensalism: One animal benefits from the relationship, but the other is not affected. For example, a bird builds a nest in a tree, and the tree is not affected.

Parasitism: One animal benefits from the relationship, but the other is harmed. For example, a tick feeds on a dog's blood, and the dog is harmed.

Reptile Adaptations

Reptiles have a natural advantage over other animals living in the desert environment. Reptiles have thick skin that minimizes water loss.

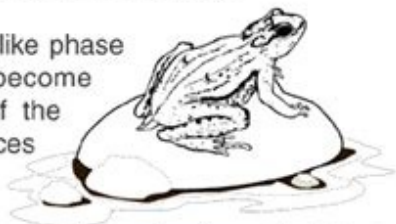

Reptiles are cold-blooded—that is, their body temperature stays about the same as the temperature of their surroundings. To stay alive, these animals must avoid extremely high or low temperatures.

Many species of reptiles that live in hot climates are active mainly at night. Reptiles that are active during the day keep moving from sunny places to shady spots. Some lizards have longer legs, so they absorb less surface heat while running.

Some reptiles undergo a hibernation-like phase called estivation, in which they become dormant during the hot, dry part of the summer. They go to deep cool places and live using their stored fat.

In the fall, when the weather begins to cool, reptiles lose their body heat. During the day, they will climb up on rocks that have been heated by the sun in order to raise their body temperature.

Reptiles in regions that have harsh winters hibernate during the winter. They burrowing into the ground or slip into a crack between two rocks and stay there until the weather warms up. Before hibernating, a reptile eats a lot of food, which forms a layer of fat in its body. The fat serves as food during hibernation.

These Animal Classification worksheet pages are a great way for children of all ages to practice and improve their knowledge of animals as well as work on their fine motor skills. In these classifying animals worksheet, children will cut and paste the animals into the correct columns. This animal classification for kids activity is perfect for first grade, 2nd grade, 3rd grade, 4th grade, 5th grade, and 6th graders too. Simply print free printable animal classification worksheets and you are ready to play and learn about animals for kids. Animal Classification Worksheet Animal classification is when scientists organize animals into groups and sort them by what they have in common. This makes it easier for scientists to study animals. For an example: A whale and a dog don't have as much in common, but a dog and a wolf do. The five most well known classes of vertebrates (animals with backbones) are mammals, birds, fish, reptiles, and amphibians. Two of the most commonly known classes of invertebrates (animals without a backbone) are arachnids (spiders) and insects. These classification of animals worksheet pdf are a great way for elementary age children in grade 1, grade 2, grade 3, grade 4, grade 5, and grade 6 students to learn about animal classifications for kids!
