Gross income can include other employment earnings in addition to salaries (bonuses, for example), as well as interest and dividends, long- and short-term capital gains and losses, interest, dividends, alimony, pensions and annuities, rental property income, royalties, and any revenue derived from operating a business. Calculating AGI is an important first step because it serves as the foundation for determining the deductions and credits for which you may qualify and the income tax you owe. All of these income sources are accounted for on the first few lines of Form 1040 and Part I of Schedule 1. When filing your taxes, your adjusted gross income is simply a your gross income minus any adjustments. Your AGI is an adjustment of your gross income, so it includes all sources of income (wages, dividends, capital gains, business income, retirement distributions, etc.), but it then reduces the full amount with any above-the-line adjustments you are eligible for. Adjusted gross income (AGI) is a tax term for your gross income minus tax deductions that are allowable whether or not you itemize deductions when you file your tax return. Itemized or standard deductions are then deducted from your AGI to arrive at your final taxable income. Gross income also includes net gains on disposal of assets, such as selling a home or car, or any money obtained through self-employment, consulting, side jobs, and other sources of income. The list of items that contribute to your total gross income is extensive, and you may need help determining what's considered income for this purpose. Tax software will help you identify all earnings that need to be reported to the government by asking questions in the tax interview, or you can ask an accountant for advice. No, but your AGI is a step on the way to reaching your taxable income. Using these deductions will allow you to lower your adjusted gross income, potentially resulting in a tax refund. To determine your AGI, start with your gross income and subtract qualifying items to reduce the amount. For example, if you are a school teacher who purchases necessary classroom supplies, these can be deducted as an expense. It's important not to confuse gross income with net income. Before you calculate your adjusted gross income, you must determine your gross income—the total income on Form 1040—that you earned for the tax year in which you're filing. Adjustments to income are deducted from your gross income. Knowing what these are will help you make sure you are paying your taxes correctly. Also, if you sold any items on eBay, Craigslist, or another online store, you have gained income from profits by selling goods. They're also called "adjustments to income," and they're calculated on IRS Schedule 1. There are several types of expenses that can be deducted to arrive at your adjusted gross income. Otherwise, if you don't understand the difference between AGI and gross income or how to calculate it, you may pay more than you need to in income taxes. Your adjusted gross income (AGI) is your taxable income after removing any adjustments to your gross income. It's used to determine any deductions and credits you will receive, and taxes you will have to pay. Your AGI is calculated before you take itemized or standard deductions. Net income refers to take-home pay or the amount of money earned after payroll withholding, such as state and federal income taxes, Social Security taxes, and pretax benefits like health insurance premiums. Once you have taken adjustments from your gross income to reach your AGI, you can then apply credits and deductions to reach your taxable income. Common items can include: Educator expenses, such as supplies paid for by teachersMoving expenses for members of the armed forcesHealth care savings account deductionCollege tuition and fees or student loan interestContributions to certain retirement accountsSEP-IRA, SIMPLE IRA and 401(k) deductions for the self-employedPenalties from financial institutions for early withdrawal of savingsAlimony payments If you're doing your own taxes, tax software can automatically calculate your AGI.
