Come on, make sure you have it, we'll wait. You got that? If you don't, breathe calmly. It's a simple solution. Google has just announced a feature that lets you pinpoint exactly where your phone is by simply typing "Find My Phone" in the search bar. It's Digital, a map will appear and you will know where on Earth your cell is hiding (with some warnings; keep reading). Until your own and the computer are connected to the same Google account, you should be able to restrict the location of the phone. If you have enabled localization services on your Android and have Bluetooth enabled, the search result at the top should be where you have to go (approximately) to get your beloved piece of technology back into your hands. Is your phone somewhere in your house? They got that covered too much to let you call via a button from Google search result. The phone ringtone turns out at full volume even if the sound is off, the perfect solution for when the phone ends under the sofa cushion, in the linen basket or in the dishwasher. (More strange things have happened.) Although you may have located a missing device online before (via Android Device Manager), this new feature makes you look for your precious MOLTO membership easier. And in the old days of last week, if the phone was at home and the ringtone was off, your luck was over.
